

"The woman was Passuk. I got her in fair trade from her people, who were

"As I said at Forty Mile, every inch of it was snowshoe work. And the shoes made great sores on our feet, which cracked and scabbed, but would not break in twenty days, these snowin and eat his grub with moans and groans, and sleep. He was not sick, this man. He was only tall sore and tired, and weak with hunger. But Passuk and I were tall sore and tired, and weak with hunger; and we had no work and he did none. But he had the strength of a fawn, and our brother Bottle had spoken. Further, we gave the man always his fair share of grub.

Then one day we met two ghosts journeying through the Silence. They were a man and a boy, and they were white. One the first of the Lake of Ruins, and though it had now been

The next morning I divided all the grub, which was little, into three portions. And I told Long Jeff that he could keep up with us or not, as he saw fit, for we were going to travel light and fast. But he raised his voice and cried over his sore feet and his troubles and said harsh things against

"He did not ask for grub, for he could see we, too, were hard put. Pasuk looked at the man and at me, as though he saw of two minds, like a mother partridge whose young are in trouble. So he turned to her and said, 'This man has been dealt unfair. Shall I buy him one of our grub a portion?' He saw her eyes light, as with quick pleasure, but she looked down at the

and a budding and sprouting of green things. And there is drumming of partridges, and songs of robins, and great music for the winter is broken. Pass in the foreground, beside the train, a wolf, bristling with frost, thrust a long snout heavenward and moaned.
